SOME FAMOUS INDIAN WOMEN He is making his headquarters at Young's Patriots and Soldiers Whose Names Live in History. From the Ninetcenth Century and After.

Even during the middle ages, when India was steeped in ignorance, the country produced many women who were the peers of the best men of their time. Females ruled wisely in various parts of the land, and wrote notable books on philosophy and religion. Judiths were not lacking in the history of medieval India, which, with its countless conflicts, produced numerous Holofernes. One of these brave women of the days gone by was the Queen of Ganor. She found herself compelled to marry the Mohammedan who had conquered her in war. With rare subtlety she placidly went through the marriage ceremony that tied her for life to her hated victor, and then presented her husband with a poisoned unic, informing him of his impending doom when it was too late for him to save his life; committing suicide as soon as he was dead.

Another woman managed to escape the clutches of Aurangzeb, who proposed to force her into his harem, but offering to marry the Rana Raj Singh of Meywar. Rai Singh seldom took a step in any matter of importance without consulting talented wife, and it is declared that her
